Description
Galen Terrace is a rehab of an existing Section 8 housing community made up of three three-story apartment buildings on two separate parcels in the Anacostia neighborhood of South East Washington, D.C. Located in the heart of a historic district, including the Frederick Douglas home, with access to public transportation and many amenities, the site has much to offer. The neighborhood is among the lowest-income and highest crime rate areas in the District of Columbia. With significant input from community residents, Galen Terrace underwent a major renovation to address safety, crime and security including the incorporation of recommendations from a safety audit. The renovation corrected ineffective perimeter fencing and broken door locks hardware and added more security features such as: electronic access at the entrance, improved lighting and fencing and security cameras. The renovation also included new kitchens and baths, painting, carpeting, drywall repair, sanitary sewer repairs, new HVAC, stairwell upgrades, handrail modifications, roof replacement, exterior painting and improvements and new windows. Also added was an onsite management office and community space with a computer center.

The Green Advantage
The project includes a comprehensive review by an energy auditor to identify and help incorporate all cost-effective energy improvements with a 10-year or less payback period. The plans include Energy Star refrigerators, clothes washers (when the existing laundry contract is renewed), light fixtures and daylight sensors on all outdoor lighting. Other elements such as hot water heaters, pipes, clothes dryers, reflective roofing, wood, carpeting, water collection rain barrels for landscape watering and plant selection also comply with green standards. Renters will receive a Green Home Guide and orientations to explain and review green building features, operations and maintenance. The site also satisfies green criteria in terms of proximity to community facilities and stores.

Rents
Despite persistent socio-economic challenges, the neighborhood is ripe for gentrification due to the Washington, D.C., region’s strong job and housing markets, with the potential to displace current low- and moderate-income residents. Real estate tax assessments in Anacostia have increased 99 percent in the past three years, exerting pressure on housing prices and rents, making the preservation of affordable housing an even more pressing priority. The development partnership secured a 20-year extension of the HUD Housing Assistance Payment Section 8 contract allowing tenants to remain and experience no rent increase.
